FLASH OF GENIUS RESCUES STRANDED WALKER

23-year-old Malcolm Murray set out on a Friday afternoon in February for a walk with his dog on the Isle of Lewis, in the north of Britain.

Despite being a local and an experienced walker, he got lost because of bad weather. Luckily he had a mobile phone and a compact camera with him. These two gadgets saved his life.

He said: "I just wanted to take the dog for a quick walk. There was a bit of fog when I left. But later it became very thick and I was basically lost." Realising how serious the situation was becoming, he phoned his father, who came up with a plan to find his son: driving up and down the road, beeping the car horn every mile or so. But his son didn't hear a thing and by late afternoon they decided they had to call in professional rescuers.

Four rescue teams set off to find Murray on foot. The Coastguard also sent in a helicopter. After some time Murray could see the helicopter lights coming and going. So, when it got close, he pressed his camera flash over and over again.

Murray's flash was spotted by Captain Richard on board the helicopter. "It really was very clever use of the equipment he had with him," he said. "I spotted a flash in the sky and then the infrared showed us exactly where Mr. Murray and his dog were. It was the flash that saved them."

Murray senior, who had spent the evening at home on the telephone, was proud of his son's calmness and presence of mind.

You have found the following message on an internet forum about teen problems :

I'm worried about my best friend, Pat. A few weeks ago, she ate pizza with extra toppings and drank Cola at my birthday party. And now, she can't bear the thought of pepperoni or any of her other favorite foods (and she seems to know the exact calory content of all of them). She's making excuses not to eat lunch at school and I've seen her take pills. She 's lost a lot of weight, but she doesn't even seem to notice the change in her appearance. Do you think she could have an eating disorder? If so, how can I help her?
