PASSENGER JET HELPS TO RESCUE MISSING SAILOR

An Air Canada plane decreased altitude to 4,000ft to assist rescuers in the search for the solo yachtsman who had activated his emergency beacon. His remote location was out of helicopter range, so rescuers asked the plane's pilot to get involved as they were flying over the yacht's GPS position.

The pilot, Captain Andrew Robertson, said once he had determined he had enough kerosene to land the plane safely in Sydney after diverting to search for the yacht, he swooped down to 5,000ft and reduced speed while the crew peered out. "As we got to about two to three miles from this yacht, the first officer said 'there it is, I see it', pointing at a reflection from a mirror shining upwards. I was amazed." Captain Robertson circled around once more at 3,700ft for a closer look to see if anyone was on board. It was then that they saw the yachtsman. Captain Robertson said the search was the first of his aviation career.

"A lot of passengers said it was very exciting to be involved in a search like this," he said. According to Sydney's Daily Telegraph, one passenger wrote on Facebook: "15-hour flight ends up being 17 hours as we descended to 4,000ft to locate an overturned yacht for search and rescue."

Air Canada spokesman Peter Fitzpatrick said the crew and a number of passengers on board spotted the boat and informed authorities about its location at once. "After we informed the customers on board that we would assist as we were the only aircraft in the immediate vicinity, all on board became involved in the search efforts." The crew borrowed binoculars from customers and also engaged them to help look.

The Australian Maritime Safety Authority (AMSA) said the 44-year-old sailor had now been picked up; he is in good spirits and uninjured after drifting for 16 hours.

Speaking about the involvement of the passenger jet, a spokesperson from AMSA said: "It's not a regular occurrence, but that's because incidents are usually much closer to shore. AMSA thanks the captain and crew of the Air Canada aircraft for their assistance in the search and rescue operation, and their passengers for their patience."

DINOSAUR INTERVIEW THAT CAN MAKE CAREERS EXTINCT

Could you cope?

So you're fully prepped for the interview, wearing a new suit and your CV is beyond reproach. But to win that dream job you must work out what sort of dinosaur you are. Prospective employers are increasingly using 'extreme interviewing' techniques which include questions such as: 'If you were a dinosaur, what would you be?'

Although they say the way the candidate handles the question is more important than the actual answer, chances are that if you said you were a Tyrannosaurus rex, you won't be getting the job. Apparently, the hapless candidate is told: 'Aha, so you are a cannibalistic predator preying on the weak, are you?'

The dinosaur tactic, a favourite of City employers, is part of a craze for throwing bizarre questions at candidates to see how they react. Some other genuine questions asked of potential employees include: 'If you were a biscuit, what sort would you be?' 'Name me three Lady Gaga songs.' And 'With a four-minute hourglass, and a seven-minute hourglass, how can you measure exactly nine minutes − without taking longer than nine minutes?'

The technique − designed to distinguish the capable candidate from the exceptional at a time when a quarter of recent graduates are unemployed − originated in California's Silicon Valley. Google, which is based there, is renowned for its intense interview process, with 50-page dossiers sometimes being prepared for a potential employee. One recent question was: 'You are stranded on a desert island. You have 60 seconds to choose people of ten professions to come with you. Who do you choose? Go!'

Computer manufacturer Hewlett-Packard prefers questions such as: 'If Germans were the tallest people in the world, how would you prove it?' − a reference to the first line of their national anthem, Deutschland Deutschland über alles.

The idea of extreme interviewing is to see how quickly job-seekers think on their feet and one of its pioneers was the late Steve Jobs, co-founder of Apple. Dealing with a candidate he considered dull, Jobs started flapping his arms and clucking like a chicken to judge his reaction.

David Moyle, a headhunter with the Eximius Group in London, admits he has used the dinosaur question to recruit. He said: 'We are trying to give the candidates an opportunity to show their personality, rather than just showing how they perform in an interview.'

18) Employers claim that your reaction to some of the questions might matter more than the content of your answers. 18)

19) City employers are reluctant to ask candidates about dinosaurs or other bizarre topics. 19)

20) With such a high number of candidates for each job opening, employers will go to great lengths to find the most outstanding ones. 20)

21) A large section of a Google interview is conducted in writing. 21)

22) All Hewlett-Packard employees speak German as a first or second language. 22)

RISE IN 'SLAVERY' TRAFFICKING OF HOMELESS BY GANGS

Reported cases of "modern-day slavery" are becoming increasingly common, according to the police and homeless charities.

Thames Reach, which works with homeless people in London, said that so far this year, it was aware of at least 37 incidents involving people who had been forced to work for little or no pay and even made to break the law, compared with 22 last year.

Thames Reach manager Megan Stewart said the recent court case in which four men from a caravan site in Bedfordshire were convicted of controlling and exploiting homeless people had brought about a shift in how society viewed the problem. "People are getting better at spotting the signs," Stewart said, "and the police are taking it more seriously when our guys report it."

The exploitation involves trafficking people into the UK but also targeting homeless people on the streets.

The Passage Day Centre in London's Victoria, which helps homeless people, said its clients were regularly targeted both at the centre and at soup runs. "A couple of weeks ago, some people approached our clients with the offer of work in Belgium," said Mick Clarke, who runs the centre. "They said they'd provide them with accommodation and money and when we challenged them, they sped off."

Clarke said traffickers benefited from the economic downturn, which meant people were ripe for exploitation. "It's linked to the economy – people are more and more desperate," Clarke said. "And there is real diversity in the backgrounds of those who are doing this – there are builders, people in suits, people from all ethnicities."

Police say in many cases those who were exploited had been told that they or their families back home would face violence if they reported what had happened to them. A man who was referred to Thames Reach by St Thomas's hospital had been trafficked into the country by a gang. When he complained about not being paid, he was beaten up and left on the streets with brain damage. Other cases involved two Hungarian men who were held by criminals in Birmingham and forced to work on driveways, and a Czech man who was beaten by the owners of a car wash in north London before escaping.

The Department for Communities and Local Government has worked with the Passage Centre to fund a campaign to highlight the issue, and embassies in eastern Europe are also helping to raise awareness of the risk involved in working in the UK.

Task B

You found the following letter on the Moral Issues internet forum:

In June I started working as a kitchen-hand at a popular restaurant owned by a friend of my father's. It was just perfect: they let me work four times a week with my choice of shifts: I could sleep in and make enough money to go to the beach and hang out with my friends.

I make friends easily and by the end of my first week I knew everyone's name in the restaurant. One member of the kitchen staff called Rose had been working at the restaurant for four years chopping vegetables for the salad bar and was especially kind to me. One night she casually mentioned her hourly wage in the middle of a conversation and I felt my stomach turn over. It was half of what I was making and she's 35 with two young children. I felt guilty, ashamed and also angry. How could that even happen?

When I tried to talk to Rose about it, she grew uncomfortable and nervous. "Please don't say anything to the boss, Brian. Anyone who complains from the kitchen is usually fired."

Apparently, by taking a stand and saying something I could make things even harder and more unfair for Rose and the rest of the kitchen staff. However, by staying silent I'm allowing that injustice to carry on. If nobody is going to do anything, how can things ever change?

Is there anything I could do? I would appreciate your ideas.
